Miss Helen Bartlett, of Flint, Mich., was here Wednesday to investigate for the Ovis' National association the feasibility and methods of pheasant propagation at the national park near Gaysville, consisting of the former Richardson and Lory farms in Stockbridge, about seven miles from this village. Miss Bartlett, who is perhaps the leading American authority on the subject, made her observations during the storm which forbade the average pleasure of a day in a region of deserted farms. She came back to her hotel with a definite conviction of the favorable nature of the locale for the purpose intended and will report in detail as to conditions and methods. In brief she will recommend that the eggs of the golden pheasant be set under bantams in nests protected by pens perhaps six feet square and that to guard against the flight of the birds their wings be clipped in the first stages of the experiment. Later an atmosphere will be created which will discipline the birds to desert their habitat and although they will fly miles away they will return to the general location of their birth. The purpose of the Ovis is to populate the Vermont forests with these beautiful and largest forest game birds, which often reach a five-pound size. Some varieties of pheasant exist in Vermont to-day but the golden pheasant, a native of northern China, is believed to be better adapted to the Vermont climate than other varieties. But for the war, the birds would have developed their national park several years ago. If they decide to act favorably upon Miss Bartlett's recommendations, the experiment will be made next summer, it is expected.
